David C. Taylor was born and raised in New York City with a few early detours to Europe. He was incarcerated in schools on both continents until finally set free after completing his formal education at Yale University. He joined the Peace Corps after college and spent two years in the Marshall Islands. He returned to New York to work as a teacher, and then moved to Madrid, Spain, to teach himself how to write. He came to New York to work as a bartender in Greenwich Village, and then moved to Vienna, Austria for two years in pursuit of the cellist who became his wife. Realizing that they would starve to death on what they pay short story writers, they moved to Los Angeles where he worked as a movie/TV writer for more than twenty years. He co-authored an Off-Broadway musical, briefly wrote a column for a national magazine, and has published three novels in the last six years with another to follow next February. The first novel, “Night Life”, was a finalist for The Edgar Awards and won the Nero Wolf Award. He and his wife now divide their time between Boston and an old farmhouse on the coast of Maine. His father, Samuel Taylor was a Broadway playwright: The Happy Time, Sabrina Fair, The Pleasure Of His Company, No Strings (a musical with Richard Rodgers), and a sometime screenwriter: Sabrina, Alfred Hitchcock’s Torn Curtain and Vertigo.
